

This little book is a box of all-sorts, something for everyone, sort of. If you like a fact, be ready for it to be served with dollops of fun and fantasy. If you like a Selkie, Minotaur or mythical Greek Goddess, there's all of that, but we also have painters, soldiers, climbers, migrants, a Prince, a Priest and a Saint, plus rivers, seas, mountains and moons. If you like a Memoir, there's a Thread of that running through this book, but do not expect too much in the way of orderly chronological narrative, because there are off-route meanderings and the occasional doubling-back.

If you are living a perfectly respectable life in the real world, be ready to be frog-marched into fiction.

So, it's a bit all over the place, but beginning in the Labyrinth of King Minos of Crete, there are Golden Threads to follow through the darkness to the light at the end. The chapters are headed-up with words from a song, plus an image, most of them hand-drawn and including two contributions by John Every.

In a way, the songs are a key that opens the door to lines of enquiry into things such as faith, life on earth, geology and inter-planetary exploration, but without ever passing up an opportunity to find what song gives us – the poetry in life. So, are you ready to follow me into the Labyrinth? Don't worry, we've sent Theseus ahead to see to the Minotaur.....
